

Why Women Should not Have Sex Before Marriage

Elaine Chen

According to research, nearly one-third of all girls have sex before marriage. Moreover, the number is increasing. As support for women's rights grows, many women think that they should have the power over their own bodies, instead of following the traditional rules. However, sex before marriage is not a justified reason to claim that women have power and are independent. I shall argue that women should not have sex before marriage.

As a whole, our society is paternal. This is a sad but true fact of human existence. Men see women in a different light if they know that their wives or girlfriends are not virgins, especially when it comes to marriage. According to research, men who don't have sex with their partners before marriage tend to respect women more and treat them well. Although we say men and women are born equal, the idea that virgins are decent and virtuous women is still deeply rooted in our minds. Women are generally more well-behaved and reserved before they have sex with their partners. Having sex is not only a physical, but also a mental change. After having sex, girls tend to think that they don't have to be reserved anymore, thereby lowering their social position.

Some men will assume that a girl would be loyal to them after they have had sex. So the position between both sides will change. In conclusion, it's always the girl who is taken advantage of. Virginitly is somehow a safeguard for girls. (If the girls themselves feel they don't have to be as reserved any more, no one is 'taking advantage' of them.)

Even after the marriage begins, it's better for women to have been virgins. Inevitably, men will cherish their wives, if they know that they were virgins beforehand. It's rare that any man will accept and feel nothing about the fact that his wife had sex with someone else before marriage. It is somehow a bomb in the marriage.

Furthermore, health is another reason why women should not have sex before marriage. People are “open-minded” about sex nowadays. One night stands or multiple sexual partners are nothing new. Of course, all the sexual diseases will tend to follow this behavior. More and more people die of AIDS or other sexual-transmitted diseases every year. Furthermore, some women can develop various cancers like cervical cancer, sometimes even developing from a sexually-transmitted disease itself. Other than getting sick, pregnancy is another risk factor. Due to the increase of sex before marriage, there are often unexpected pregnancies. Some are carried to term but some are aborted. Mentally, women suffer tremendously if they have to have an abortion. It does irreparable damage to a woman’s body and mind. The shame of an abortion will stay on her conscious forever. This is yet another bad consequence of sex before marriage.

Why should women not have sex before marriage? There are many compelling reasons, all of which I have mentioned in this paper. (You’ve mentioned every risk?).

Nevertheless, the main reason should be that women should learn how to love themselves. Having sex before marriage is often harmful toward women. To protect themselves, women should not have sex before marriage.

(Everything you have said is really just general knowledge. This isn’t exactly persuasive.)
